Brand New Book  Print on Demand .U is an exploration of the idea that trusting your first instinct when writing can lead to very interesting and unexpected places. It was written using an expanded form of poetry taught in grade school. The author chose seven letters, which by themselves are words, as the starting points for each line, and used every possible combination of those seven letters in succession to establish the final structure of the piece. Writing it was like an inkblot exercise of sorts, Michael Hofmeister has stated. By forcing myself to use predetermined letters to begin each line, I chose words I normally wouldn't use, which ended up being a unique way to trick my subconscious into revealing what was really on my mind at that time. Also, at some point, he started to realize the poems were unintentionally yielding distinct physical images due to the somewhat controlled but also random placement of the words. He began to play with these images until they fit the page and the project took on a whole new life as a form of word art or shape poetry. Pull the page away from your face and let your eyes drift for a moment and see if any images stick out from the white landscape behind the words. Written over the course of a two week period, U is comparable to a musical theme album in that it's best when read straight through in one sitting.
